

Change the world. Start in New Orleans.

LSU School of Public Health - New Orleans

The LSU Health campus in New Orleans has a long history in the city and serving the residents of the area and the School of Public Health plays a big role in those connections. These relationships afford those who study here an opportunity to work directly with the organizations that make Public Health possible in New Orleans, giving them hands-on experience and tangible skills that you get to take with you into your future endeavors.

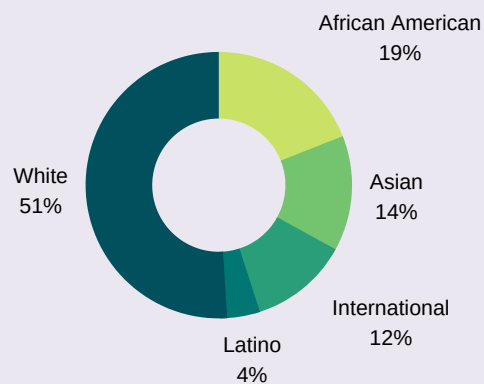

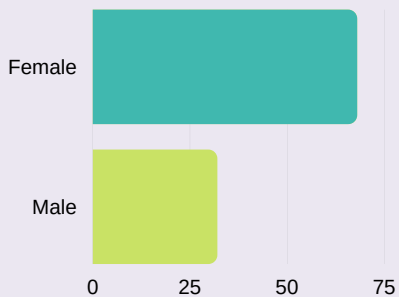

Joint Degree Programs

Public Health plays an important part in every health science – after all, keeping the community healthy is the first step towards helping prevent the issues that doctors, veterinarians and social workers see every day in those they care for. It is with that understanding that the LSU School of Public Health has created joint degree programs that provide students who are studying patient care in those fields an opportunity to combine their primary focus with completing a Masters of Public Health.

Gender & Diversity

One of the goals of the LSU School of Public Health is to prepare students to address the changing needs of society, diverse in economic status, race/ethnicity, religion, sexual orientation and sexual identity.

It is, therefore, important to us that the student body reflects that goal. With a population that reflects that of the state of Louisiana, we are training the next generation of Public Health workers in a way that reflects the community we call home.

Student to Teacher Ratio

Are you looking for a place that will know your name and not treat you just like another number? That's exactly what you'll get at the LSU School of Public Health.

With two students to every faculty member, you will be learning in an environment where everyone knows your name and fosters your passions.
